Personal Upload Scheduler

A private command-line tool used by one person to publish their own videos to their own YouTube channels.

This tool is not distributed. There is no download, no sign-up, no hosted interface and no public endpoint. It is not offered to, sold to, or usable by anyone other than its author. This page exists to document the tool for the YouTube API Services compliance audit.

What it does

The tool reads a local JSON configuration file describing one finished video — file path, title, description, tags, category, thumbnail image and scheduled publish time — and uploads it to a YouTube channel owned by the author.

It is operated from a terminal on the author's own computer. A `--dry-run` mode prints exactly what would be sent without calling the API, so every release can be reviewed before anything is transmitted.

YouTube API Services used

API method	Purpose
<code>videos.insert</code>	Upload a video file owned by the author
<code>thumbnails.set</code>	Set the custom thumbnail for that video
<code>videos.list</code>	Read back the author's own video to confirm the upload
<code>playlistItems.insert</code>	Add the author's own video to the author's own playlist

No other YouTube API methods are called.

Data handling

The tool processes only the author's own content and metadata. It does not read, store, display, aggregate or republish data belonging to any other YouTube user or channel. It performs no search, no analytics on third parties, and no data collection of any kind from other people.

Authentication uses OAuth 2.0. Tokens are stored locally on the author's own machine and are never transmitted anywhere except to Google's own API endpoints.

Channels

The tool publishes to the following channels, all owned and operated by the author:
